

The Spring Behind My Glimmer

— — — — —
You were the spring that taught my heart to bloom, even if winter was the only season you left behind.

A collection of poems by
— — — — —
METHMA NETHMI

The Spring Behind My Glimmer

A Debut Poetry Collection

Written by Methma Nethmi

Copyright © 2026 Methma Nethmi

All rights reserved.

First Edition · 2026

Independently published by Methma Nethmi

Published through YHK House of Verse Publications.

All poems and original written content in this collection are the intellectual property of the author unless otherwise stated.

No part of this book may be reproduced, distributed, or published elsewhere without the author's prior permission, subject to applicable law.

Cover Design: Methma Nethmi

Drawings: Methma Nethmi

Text Design: Methma Nethmi

To my mother, who listened to every little thought my heart could not keep quiet.

To my father, whose silent strength held me through every season.

To my brother, who has always known me even in the words I never said.

And to my spring, who made my heart blossom and taught me how beautiful it is to love.

“She loved the roots beneath his bloom, and when spring faded into autumn, winter, and all the seasons yet to come, her heart remained.”

Contents

	Page
Author's Note	08
I. The Sea Before Spring	10
II. The Horizon I Dreamt Of	11
III. What I Called Love	12
IV. The Abundance I Called Home	14
V. A Winter Without Wanting	17
VI. The First Tide	19
VII. The One the Breeze Carried	20
VIII. Before the Heart Could Speak	22
IX. The Sun I Never Questioned	24
X. The Name My Heart Already Knew	26
XI. The Gentleness of Spring	28
XII. When the Sun Answered	30
XIII. The Shape of Being Beautiful	32
XIV. The Season I Thought Would Stay	34
XV. The Gift of Belonging	35
XVI. The Right to Call It Ours	36
XVII. The Storm That Came in Spring	37
XVIII. The Calm Before Goodbye	38
XIX. The Ruins Beneath My Calm	39
XX. How Does One Release Spring	41
XXI. The Sun Beyond My Reach	42
XXII. The Prayer Beneath the Tide	44
XXIII. The Art of Becoming Distant	45
XXIV. A Prayer the Stars Could Hear	47
XXV. The Distance Between Two Skies	48

XXVI. My Mr Darcy	50
XXVII. The Prayer That Remains	52
XXVIII. The Distance Between Two Shores	54
XXIX. What the Heart Chooses	56
XXX. The Love I Will Not Curse	57
XXXI. To My Best Friend ♡	59
XXXII. Is It So Wrong to Feel?	61
XXXIII. The Distance We Chose	63
XXXIV. The Quiet Art of Letting Go	64
XXXV. The Life I Let You Keep	66
XXXVI. Battlefield: Heart vs Brain	69
XXXVII. Granted	71
XXXVIII. The Words That Stayed	73
XXXIX. The Dream	75
XL. The Little Things That Remained	77
XLI. When the Garden Turned to Ash	77
XLII. The Love That Stayed	81

Author's Note

Here, I bring you my debut poetry collection, The Spring Behind My Glimmer. Even now, it feels a little like a dream. To someone who once struggled to find her voice in this language, being able to transform those very words into poetry feels like a quiet miracle.

Life moves through seasons. We encounter different emotions, circumstances, and souls along the way. Some remain, some depart, yet each leaves behind something that becomes a part of who we are. Love, too, has its seasons. It arrives unexpectedly, awakens something within us, sometimes stays, and sometimes teaches us how to carry its absence.

This collection is a blend of fiction and lived emotion, woven through memories, imagination, love, loss, longing, and the quiet ways in which we grow. Some pages may feel familiar, some may belong entirely to another world, but I hope each finds a small place within your own.

As you turn these pages, I invite you not merely to read, but to feel. To pause between the words, wander through the seasons, and perhaps find a little of yourself among them.

With that, I would like to offer my deepest gratitude to my family, my teachers, my friends, my muse, and every soul whose presence, love, kindness, or absence became a thread in these pages. This book could not have bloomed without you.

And now, The Spring Behind My Glimmer is no longer only mine. From here onwards, it is yours.

With love,

Methma Nethmi

I. The Sea Before Spring

Before I knew the warmth of spring,

I lived beneath a quiet sky, a bright-eyed dreamer, loved by a family that trusted me with their world.

I learned to feel another's sorrow before my own, and called it kindness when I forgot myself.

My days were calm,
my heart was full,
and happiness needed nothing more than what I had.

II. The Horizon I Dreamt Of

Yet somewhere beyond my peaceful sea,

I dreamt of a love that had not found me.

Tall in stature, yet gentler than the sky.
strong enough to rule a kingdom, yet calm enough to hold mine.

I wanted a home where love spoke softly, where forever felt safe, where happiness grew around a family of our own.

I was not missing anything.
I was simply a sea, deep and quietly shining, until spring arrived with a name I never knew.

III.What I Called Love

Never knowing the warmth of being chosen, only the quiet art of being there for others.

Carrying their storms with a borrowed light, while unanswered questions waited somewhere within for a voice.

Words grew tired from explaining, not from love of speaking, but fear of being mistaken for someone they were not.

A heart that would stay through the unfinished, find beauty in the fractures, and never turn away from the face it carried.

Someone to say when the path went wrong, yet listen without closing their doors.

A love that spoke, not one that buried its storms beneath a quiet sky.

For a sunflower had bloomed long before the dawn, turning toward a light it had always given others.

Was it too much to ask for one of its own, to lean into the warmth when the sun forgot to rise?

IV. The Abundance I Called Home

Love was never something I went searching for.
It bloomed within the little world I called home.

My mother,
my grounding earth.
A heart without judgement, a refuge for every confession.

She carried empathy like a second skin, yet held her courage like a flame.

Gentle,
but never fragile.
A queen who bowed to no cruelty.

My father,
the quiet architecture of our home.

Never ruling through raised voices, but through the dignity of his presence.

A composed soul, whose heartbeat was tethered to ours.

My brother, my chosen companion within the bond of blood.

A human diary, where secrets rested without fear.

A lighthouse when the world lost its shores.

And surrounded by them, love was never lacking.
It was abundant, almost celestial.

Yet,
beneath that warmth, something remained unknown.

Not the absence of love, but the absence of knowing how to live when love turns cruel.

The world waited beyond our sanctuary, with lessons no home could teach.

V. A Winter Without Wanting

A treasury of tenderness rested beneath my ribs, seeking only a place to bloom.
So I offered its riches to every soul that felt like home.

Trust came unguarded, without a shiel against the unfamiliar.
Venom was a language, my innocence had never learned.

I wished to be a solitary star at the rim of night, a quiet beacon for some lost voyager adrift upon the sea.

So I tended my radiance, through restless nights, through relentless becoming.

My flaws were held beneath a merciless gaze.
Yet, when they wounded others, change arrived without hesitation.

Strengths remained unwreathed in praise.
The flowers I deserved were always left in another garden.
What a peculiar life.

Days were crowded, yet followed their familiar rhythm.

A gentle winter held everything I had once wished for, until the sun found its way into my sky.

VI. The First Tide

Each dawn unlatched a door, and new tides found their way in.

Fresh faces and borrowed dreams strange thoughts , soft laughter,
unfamiliar skies,
A thousand colours met in one place.
And I kept gathering them.

New duties came like rain, yet caring felt like prayer.
Hands were busy , hearts were fuller,
and joy kept finding me.

They saw a light I tried to guard.
So I polished every little flaw, never wanting to dim the faith, that bloomed in their eyes.

Life was a whirl of beautiful becoming, and I loved the way it moved.

VII. The One the Breeze Carried

Nothing was planned, no hands pulling at destiny, only two lives drifting closer without knowing why

Somewhere between words and silences, a bond began to breathe He listened as though my burdens were never too much, and spoke like an evening breeze through an open window

Time softened around his presence, hours dissolved without a sound Some thoughts found their way into his words, before reaching the edge of my lips

He carried the vastness of an unwritten sky, and for a moment, the universe felt close enough to speak with

I knew so little of his depths, yet something within me leaned towards him before reason could give it a name.
He noticed when my glimmer began to fade, and knew the quiet ways to call it back

Who was he?
I could not tell, but the heart had already recognised a familiar sky
So I stayed within the moment, never asking where the road would lead.

The days slipped past, softly, silently, and I never noticed how time had begun to leave us behind.

VIII. Before the Heart Could Speak

Perhaps the stars had their own designs, and perhaps I was only one among the many skies he had learned to read.
Yet my heart remained a little child, asking the night,
Will I be enough to be chosen and kept?

Years had passed, teaching the mirror to be kinder.
Slowly, I gathered the courage to call my reflection beautiful.

Then came he,
like air through a window left closed too long.
His words laid gentle flowers where doubt had once taken root.

But no, it was not the praise that drew me closer.

He had already found a quiet room within my heart, before either of us gave the feeling a name.

Somewhere along those uncounted days, my mornings began carrying the shape of him, and my evenings waited for his voice The unnamed grew heavier, yet I held it with trembling care.

He knew the smallest changes, the rise and fall of my glimmer, still, neither of us opened the door.
What if a word disturbed the stillness?
What if naming it made it mortal?

So we remained beneath a sky full of unsaid things.
And though the heart trembled with its own storms, his presence was enough to quiet the darkness within me.

IX. The Sun I Never Questioned

He became my breathing without a sound,
the sun,
my little world began to follow.

Was it chosen or simply written somewhere beneath thought?
I never knew.
Being a planet in his orbit felt effortless.

Morning found me hoping to see him.
Night closed its eyes with him.
And slowly, my days learned one rhythm his presence

Nothing felt missing, nothing needed changing.
I loved the gentle sameness of it all.

Yet somewhere between warmth and wonder ,
I forgot even sunlight can burn.

Still,
I would have stayed, letting his brightness touch every part of me, even if it left a little fire behind.

X. The Name My Heart Already Knew

All was gentle within our little orbit, yet somewhere my heart began seeking an anchor, something to call what felt too precious to lose.
Was I foolish to believe I could be chosen, or had doubt simply grown too loud?

My horizon, once wide as the open sea, slowly folded into a single point, him

I gave the ache a name, called it love,
and waited for an answer to return.

Not a promise to possess him, only a small sign that my heart had not been speaking alone.

For even before the world could name us, I had already made room for forever.
He was too precious to risk in the fragile act of naming.

My mind searched for a word, while my heart had already made a home.
And perhaps that nameless bond was never something I needed to define, only something I wished would remain, as necessary as breath, as quietly constant as the sea beneath the moon.

XI. The Gentleness of Spring

He arrived like spring, neither the blaze of summer nor the bite of winter, just a softness my soul already understood.
Beside him, nothing needed to be rehearsed.
I could simply unfold like a flower remembering its own name.
Before my storms could gather their thunder, he sensed the clouds within me and led me through darker paths without making the night feel heavier.
He was my polar star, a quiet direction when every road lost its light.
Hours became the briefest season, and his presence left a warmth I had never known.
No one had read the changing weather of my eyes quite like him.

Yet beyond all tenderness, he stood like a steadfast wall, guarding what I could not always protect, answering so many questions except the one my heart feared most.
He knew when my glimmer dimmed even before my lips found a word.
Was he the gentlest season to enter my life?
Perhaps.
At least,
that was how my heart remembered him.
Not a god carved from perfection, not light without shadow, but a human being,
with flaws and goodness woven together.
And what heart would not wish to call such warmth its own?
He was enough, in the truest meaning of the word.

XII. When the Sun Answered

The garden was flourishing with unnamed seasons, every little moment a petal falling into place.
Yet beneath the bloom, a quiet question kept its roots, What if the sun never belonged to my sky?

So,
one day,
I opened the hidden windows of my heart and let the unspoken meet the morning.
No riddles left beneath the tongue, only a garden confessing how deeply it had bloomed.

Then came that delicate pause, the world held its breath, and uncertainty turned everything into still water.
But somewhere beneath the silence, clarity remained.

And then,
the sun leaned closer, not as a distant light to be admired, but as warmth,
I could finally call my own.

The whole sky seemed to soften, and every flower within me opened at once
Was it happiness?
Perhaps the kind that leaves its footprints even beyond a lifetime.

For that day,
the sun was mine, and my heart believed some seasons were made to last forever.

XIII. The Shape of Being Beautiful

For the first time, the mirror felt like a kinder place, as though spring had whispered a gentler name into my reflection.

The life I once imagined was no longer beyond the horizon.
It had found a quiet way into my days, and everything felt new.

A warmth still learning the language of my skin.
The sun was a struck match beneath the ribs, a small fire that knew how to glow without noise.

Even our hands carried a secret, two little marks resting beneath the same sky, as though some distant red string had tied what neither of us knew to ask for.

His hands held a season of their own, and every touch felt like a sacred passage.

And somehow,
the spring made room for me, not through grand declarations, but through the quiet way it let my light belong.

Perhaps the sun never knew how much brightness gathered in my eyes when happiness became too full for silence.

We were both learning the tenderness of a new season, awkward yet careful, holding it as though the smallest breath could bruise its petals.

XIV. The Season I Thought Would Stay

Some beginnings arrive so gently, the heart forgets they are beginnings.
I watched the days take root and mistook their quiet rhythm for permanence.
The future seemed like a garden with no closing gate, every path leading somewhere we could remain.
There were feelings too delicate for ordinary language, a closeness that moved like breath, never asking to be noticed, yet becoming the rhythm beneath every hour.
I knew the name of the feeling, but not the shape of its ending.
Perhaps it was attachment, perhaps the heart simply loved too freely.
For beneath every bright promise, beneath the warmth and wonder, there was only this:love, quiet, unmeasured, and whole, the kind that makes a home before learning that seasons could change.

XV. The Gift of Belonging

The days grew softer around his presence and my heart learned the quiet art of longing.
Even his hands became a season, I wished to linger in.

We drew closer without counting the distance, two constellations forgetting they were once apart.
Our hearts held their own discourse a language without ink or sound.

I was known in the smallest weather of my being every tremor, every change,
every unspoken tide.

Yet some depths do not rise easily to the tongue.
They dwell where words lose their courage.
Still the spring spoke in gentler ways through the warmth, that returned through the light, that lingered.

XVI. The Right to Call It Ours

And I knew this was not a solitary dream The same moon rested upon both our waters
The life I once imagined had stepped quietly into my hands not as a distant vision but as something warm and breathing What greater grace could the heart seek than to be given a place within another's sky
The greatest gift was not the promise of forever but the tender right to call the moment ours and to feel that somewhere within this vast universe two hearts had chosen the same home.

XVII. The Storm That Came in Spring

Weeks passed like birds over an unworried sky then came the night that changed the shape of everything.

An unfamiliar cold entered the season and my oldest fear rose from its sleep.
How easily could a heart be chosen How easily could it be left.

Before the first line of our future was ever drawn the house we had carried in our dreams fell into ruin.

Two souls!! once warm with spring stood among the scattered pieces of a home, never given a beginning.

And the night has never quite ended.

XVIII. The Calm Before Goodbye

Strangely I did not break where I was expected to.
I became still,
so still the silence looked almost peaceful.
But beneath it ,a thousand frightened tides were searching for somewhere to go.

I was not calm because I knew how to lose I was calm because I could not bear, to lose him entirely:
Not the spring that had entered my days not the human soul whose presence, had become familiar as breath.

So I quietened the trembling sky, held my own ruin with careful hands and let my voice become a shelter for his storm.

The heart had no answer, only one unspoken plea: Let him remain, even if forever no longer Could be ours.

XIX. The Ruins Beneath My Calm

The calmness did not linger I wore strength like borrowed silk, staying near a heart in mourning while mine lay scattered beneath the quiet No one saw the ruins for I had made a shelter of my own silence.

And every day, every passing second a question returned to my heart Do I still love the spring?
The answer was never simple No wait, perhaps a little still,
A little larger than the ocean, wider than the sky, deeper than the universe.

And tell me what could surpass such vastness.
The sin,
I must have carried some ancient karma written beyond memory.

What did I do in another life to deserve the cruel arithmetic of losing you, of finding you and still not being allowed to keep you.

XX. How Does One Release Spring

Every few moments my hands return to the little window where your presence might bloom.
A silent ritual of waiting for a sign from a distant sky.

Within me something withers, though every part of my being pleads for stillness.
I do not wish to remain at this threshold, yet the heart knows not how to retreat.

Tell me how does one unlearn a season, how does the garden survive when its sun has gone.
How does a heart loosen its roots, without tearing the earth it grew within.

XXI. The Sun Beyond My Reach

How gorgeous he looked beneath the open sky a wandering flame with thunder resting in his hands and I a quiet witness to his radiance marvelling at a light I could no longer claim.

Once the smallest nearness could undo me a passing touch at the edge of time and every trembling star within forgot its place It was naught but an instant, yet my heart had fashioned an eternity from it.

How cruel the hands of fate to remember warmth when warmth is no longer mine.

For in the secret chambers of my mind he remains the one my heart once crowned and pride still rises when I behold him, bright untamed alive with the world.

While I, half-hidden behind the ordinary mistaking my own reflection for something unworthy of light.
The old doubts returned like winter, questioning every tender part of my being.

Beyond the quiet face and the duties carried through the day a private fire consumed its own hearth.
I stood where strength was needed, while somewhere within everything was breaking without a sound.

XXII. The Prayer Beneath the Tide

There are still oceans I have not shown you depths where your name moves quietly like a moonlit tide

My heart still breaks at every shadow of disappointment whether it falls upon you or upon yourself.

How I wish the night would return one evening of its stars just one day, beneath the same sky.
I would hold it like a seashell against my final breath.

But love must not become another chain around your wrists.
So I fold my longing into the dark and ask the heavens in a language, only silence knows.
Return him to me if only for the briefest hour.
Then let the sea carry him away.

XXIII. The Art of Becoming Distant

17 August 2025

The moon had begun to retreat and I learned the discipline of letting tides fall silent.
No more calling across the water No more
placing my little storms upon his shore.
I would answer when the wind came searching and speak only when duty opened the gate.
The stories
I once carried like shells in my palms would remain unoffered.
Not because the ocean had ceased to love.

but because even love must learn when to loosen its hold.
So I stood beneath the night pretending the distance was something I had chosen, while the sea within me kept returning to his shore.

XXIV. A Prayer the Stars Could Hear

O gentle heavens, if love has a dwelling place, let it be where his hand once rested in mine Let the same moon that watched us bloom draw our tides together once more.

For somewhere within my quietest depths, his name still moves like a prayer beneath the sea.
I do not ask for a world that bends to my wishes, only a little mercy from the turning sky

.

Let him find his way back not as a season that merely passes, but as the warmth that stays until the last light.
For I have carried a thousand unspoken vows and every one leads home to him.

Even now, my hands remember the shape of warmth as the shore remembers every tide.
I would not call it a hunger, nor a chain that binds the soul but the quiet wonder of having found a light the heart still calls its own.

XXV. The Distance Between Two Skies

I wished to see you outshine every star even the ones I mistook for my own You had enough light to teach the sun a thing or two, yet here we stand counting the shadows as though brilliance were ever promised a straight road.

Tell me, little universe did my gravity disturb your orbit Was I the storm you never named or merely another beautiful excuse for the rain.

I fell from the moon straight into the abyss how gracious of the heavens to remind me that even the stars have a talent for falling.
And yes the deeper the height the kinder the wound pretends to be.

They say we both returned to our humble zero as though the heart were an equation that could be solved by subtraction.

Yet look at me, still gathering the scattered pieces of your light still kneeling before the quiet Buddha with the same impossible prayer, not for a miracle to make you mine but for the universe to let our paths remember each other.

For even with the sky in ruins love remains the one wound,
I refuse to call a mistake.

XXVI. My Mr Darcy

All my life I had waited for a love, that would cross the distance and find me.
A storybook gentleman hidden somewhere beyond the mist.
And when spring opened its doors, I thought the waiting had finally ended.

But some arrivals are brief as starlight on restless water.
You left before I knew the season was changing.
Now when voices call you careless with my heart, I want to break the silence and defend what we were.

Yet I have always been fluent in the language of surrender.
So I nod beneath words my heart cannot accept.

Tell me, my love was I so easy to release, Was my place so small, within your sky.

Why does your laughter with other stars still reach me like winter.
Why does the distance feel greater when I watch you share the little things, once carried to my shore.

Do not keep drawing the borders of your universe
I know where I stand I have become a faraway planet in a sky I once called home.
And somewhere in the abandoned garden I am still searching for the happiness that left with your footsteps.

How does one teach the heart to forget the language of a beloved.
I am tired of gathering crumbs of sunlight, of pretending a passing glance is enough to sustain an entire season.

Tell me, how does one unlove the spring when even the ruins still remember how to bloom.

XXVII. The Prayer That Remains

Missing you has become the quiet ritual of my days, where tears return like tides to a shore that never moves.
I know not what name to give this vastness within my chest, whether it is love or longing or a storm
I have not learned to calm.

I had never surrendered my skies to another soul before you, so perhaps
I never knew how deeply a heart could bend.
When illness dims your light, something within me grows cold, and when sorrow settles in your eyes, my own skies lose their dawn.

So stay gentle with life, my love,
keep safe beneath its changing weather, for this is the only way I know to place my tenderness beside you.

I cannot tell whether your heart still keeps even a spark for mine, and though a hidden part of me still longs to be chosen, I remain.
For if your eyes ever found me and called me across the distance, I would return without question, like a tide answering the moon.

I cannot imagine a world where your light no longer reaches me, for even after all this winter, my heart still chooses you, forever.

XXVIII. The Distance Between Two Shores

30 September 2025

My love,

Another moon is nearing its third return since the tide withdrew and left a vastness between our shores.
I wonder what to call the ache that stirs when your light, appears in another sky.

Is it jealousy, or the sorrow of remembering where your warmth once rested.
There was a time when little things travelled freely between us, small fragments of laughter crossing the distance like birds returning home.

Now the same sky holds its silence and though your place, within me remains untouched the pathways that once led to you have grown still.

I did not lose only the love I had hoped would answer mine.
I lost a friendship that had become the gentlest part of my days and that absence cuts deeper than I know how to say.

So let the hours do what they must let the seasons turn their pages Perhaps one day, the tide will soften and our shores will meet again.

There is so much I have yet to tell you not to burden your quiet sky with my sorrow but to share the story of everything we once were.

Until then, my love remains like a star that keeps its place beyond the dawn.

Forever yours ♡

XXIX. What the Heart Chooses

I know the stars do not conspire to kindle hope within my sky, yet some quiet tide
beneath the moon
still dreams our shores may meet someday.

Should destiny turn another way, I shall still walk beneath my own sun for love is a garden I chose to tend and no hand can command its flowers to close.

Even the smallest warmth remains a glimmer, caught within the dusk like a moonlit sea that keeps its secret I ask for nothing, yet my heart still knows love.

XXX. The Love I Will Not Curse

I wish the wind could carry the measure of what remains, how the sea within me still rises at your name.

I have tried to teach my heart the truth of your returning never, but hearts are stubborn things they do not read the maps of reason.

Does some little star of yours still remember my sky or have I become only a season you passed through and left behind.

I hope this sorrow belongs to me alone that the night never finds your window with even a fragment of this darkness.
I would rather drown in my own sea than know it has reached you.

Whatever that day took from me, I still wish you sunlight, soft mornings and a love that never makes you ache.

And if another shore becomes the place you call home, I will fade beyond your horizon, quietly, without turning love into a wound.

For I may never have given you all that life could have offered but I could never give you hatred Only this, a love that will keep breathing, long after it has learned it cannot call you its own.

XXXI. To My Best Friend ♡

You are the hush when the world grows loud, the stillness beneath my restless skies

You hear the words
I never quite speak and find the meaning hidden in my eyes

You carry no judgement, only a patient light, turning even my heaviest hours a little easier to hold

A mind vast as the sky, yet gentle as spring rain, never knowing the glow it leaves behind

If only you could see yourself through the eyes that cherish you, you would know how much warmth your existence has given

You were the spring after a long winter, a familiar shore in an unfamiliar sea

My lighthouse, my laughter,
my quietest refuge

My human diary, where every unwritten page still knows your name

And if life keeps blooming, I hope somewhere within it your gentle light continues to find me.

XXXII. Is It So Wrong to Feel?

Is it so wrong to speak out loud, to let the silence break?
To show the storm beneath the smile, the truth behind the ache?

Is it a sin to wear your heart, not hidden, but in view?
To whisper, shout, or cry aloud, “I’m hurting, through and through”?

What if the weight inside your chest feels heavier each day?
What if your soul just needs a hand to help it find its way?

Why must this life feel like a climb on mountains made of stone?
Why does each breath sometimes feel like breaking all alone?

But still you feel, and still you speak, though no one seems to hear You are not weak, your tears are proof that you are strong, my dear.

Let emotions rise like tides and winds, let them paint the skies above For feeling deep, and feeling loud, is just another form of love.

XXXIII. The Distance We Chose

It ended just like that, with silence chosen where words had once lived.
I called it safety, a little distance for two hearts to heal.
Yet somewhere beneath that quiet we were both still breaking.
I had started the storm, and when it grew too loud, I was the one who closed the door.
He cried, and I carried that sound like a wound of my own.
Perhaps some goodbyes are not born from leaving, but from loving enough to let each other breathe.
Even when the distance kills you both a little,
every day.

XXXIV. The Quiet Art of Letting Go

I learned the language of tides by standing still, how water leaves without turning back, how the shore does not chase what once called it home

There was a season when my name fit your mouth like a prayer you never questioned Now it rests elsewhere, folded carefully in silence

I keep gardens
I no longer walk through and water them anyway, a strange devotion to nurture a bloom meant for another sky

You said I was still visible, only distant,
like a song beneath the water.

What remained, you said, was concern, a careful word that did not touch.

Yet even shattered things remember what they once were Glass remembers windows, ash remembers fire.

And I carry your joy like a fragile vessel not because I am strong, but because love,
at its furthest edge, no longer asks to be returned.

Some endings are not doors They are dissolutions and some loves do not die, they simply thin into the quiet art of letting go without ever leaving.

XXXV. The Life I Let You Keep

21 February 2026

Dear you,

There is a life of mine still standing somewhere at the edge of your season, waiting for a door that I know will never open
I have tried to teach my heart that absence is not a punishment, yet every day it forgets the lesson

Once, we lived in hours that seemed to have no ending Now even a passing shadow of your presence can keep an entire day alive How strange, to survive on such little things when once, your existence was abundance

I know there are wounds I may have left behind and I will not ask which ones still ache Some storms are known only by the shore they changed So I carry my own weather quietly, without asking yours to make room for mine

If love were allowed to speak without consequence, I would lay every broken piece at your feet and let the tide take whatever remained of me But love has taught me another kind of tenderness, the kind that loosens its hands even while the heart is begging them to hold

Will you return?
The stars have grown quiet about that question
And do I still need your light?

My garden answers before I can Yet what I cannot ask for I can still wish for you

So go on,
find whatever shore lets your soul rest.
Let your days be gentle, let your sky remain unclouded I will learn to call that happiness a kind of blessing even from far beyond its horizon.

And if this is the life where I must love you without ever reaching you, then let me live it quietly.
For some loves are not meant to be held until the end.

Some are meant to remain beneath the skin, like a season the world cannot see but the heart never quite forgets.
Love you.
I only wish I knew how to unlove you.

XXXVI. Battlefield: Heart vs Brain

The petals have forgotten the rhythm of my breathing, hanging still, as if even the wind has resigned from loving me Birdsong no longer stitches peace into my ribs; every note dissolves before it reaches my chest Even my face, once fluent in joy, has misplaced the language of smiles My world did not shatter loudly, it collapsed inward, like a star choosing silence

And yet, somewhere above the wreckage, the mind stands upright, demanding resurrection It speaks in reason, in survival, in futures that refuse to include him But this foolish heart, this reckless, loyal thing, keeps kneeling at an empty door It believes presence is stronger than absence, memory heavier than truth.

They say life can linger without thought, lungs rising and falling in borrowed time But without a heart, what remains?
Only a body rehearsing existence And so I hover between two mercies, not wanting to die, not wanting to live asleep.

If this is a war, let it be quick Let the mind learn how to soften, or the heart learn how to let go

Because I cannot keep living as a battlefield, where love refuses to retreat and reason refuses to surrender.

XXXVII. Granted

I had a smile that once came from my heart How could I smile when my heart was lost?

I told myself and everyone else “I am okay, everything will be fine” But who was I fooling?
I was not okay

Why did I fall for you?
Why can I not get over you?
I don't know
I really don't

But one question still lives inside me Was it really so easy to forget me?

Did I not love you enough?
Was everything we had so easy to erase?

How did you think I would move on as easily as you did?

If I had taken you for granted, would forgetting have been easier?
If I had loved you less, would you have stayed?

I want to forget but how do I forget the one I loved more than life, more than I should?

Every day
my heart still forgets what yours already knows that you do not want me anymore

And sometimes I wonder if I had loved you just a little more would you have stayed?

Please tell me,
would you?

XXXVIII. The Words That Stayed

Some words are spoken and disappear with the wind, while others find a quiet corner inside the heart and refuse to leave.

It was never the mirror that made me ache, nor the face I saw within it It was the thought that perhaps I was never the kind of beauty that belonged beside you.

I did not want to become someone else to be loved Yet somewhere between other people's eyes and their careless words, I began to measure myself against a beauty
I could never reach.

You never wanted me to speak of myself that way You tried to gather the pieces I kept throwing away But some wounds are strange They are made by strangers and carried long after the strangers have forgotten.

And perhaps that was the cruelest part Not that they saw me differently, but that for a while I began to see myself through their eyes.

XXXIX. The Dream

Last night, the universe was kinder than usual.
It gave me a little kingdom where you and I stood beneath an ordinary sky, dressed as though the world had somewhere important to take us.

We spoke of nothing remarkable, and then, as though written by some forgotten fairytale, you came quietly behind me and wrapped your arms around me.

So tightly, as though you had finally found the place where you were meant to rest Your head nestled into the hollow between my neck and shoulder, your eyes closed, your breath warm against my skin.

And strangely, nothing felt forbidden.
Nothing felt

Nothing felt borrowed
I was simply content.
I was afraid to move afraid the slightest breath would wake the dream, afraid you would remember that you were meant to leave.
But you did not.
Instead, you whispered, “Do not go, Just let me stay”.

How could I ever leave when the heart had waited so long for that embrace?
So I held you gently, as though holding something the heavens had trusted me with.

Then your hand found mine and rested there as if it had always known the way home.
I woke with the morning and found only an empty room, but the warmth remained like the last page of a fairytale that refuses to close.
So, dear God, dear universe, if dreams are little letters from places we cannot reach, please,
just this once,
let mine become real.

XL. The Little Things That Remained

31 July 2026

Dearest Spring,

Today, a stranger carried your scent, and for one suspended moment, the past breathed beside me again

I remember the smallest mercies, how even through the distance, you remembered the hunger I had forgotten in myself

Perhaps love is not always the hand that stays, but the root that remains beneath a season already gone

I know the answer the universe has left me, yet my heart still chooses to love what it cannot keep and quietly step away

XLI. When the Garden Turned to Ash

For a while, life remembered how to be gentle.
We walked beneath the same sky, carrying our tomorrows in both hands, learning to look ahead as though the old seasons had never happened.
And it was enough to let the past sleep, without asking whether it had truly died.

Then, one ordinary day, something small became a storm.
I reached for the match only to keep another heart from burning, never knowing the flame would find its way back to mine.

There are intentions that perish when they leave the heart Words gather them into shapes they were never meant to wear, and once a meaning is mistaken, even truth can sound like a stranger.

I had thought some hearts needed no explanation.
That being known was a language beyond words But perhaps I had mistaken familiarity for understanding

And when the one place I never feared being seen became a place where my silence was given another name, something within me turned quietly to ash

Not because anyone had wished to destroy it, perhaps the winds themselves were simply too strong Perhaps some things break without a hand intending to break them

Still, how strange to become distant from a place that once felt like home to speak and speak, yet find the meaning falling somewhere between us, never reaching the other shore.

I do not know whether I was right or whether I was wrong I only know that somewhere between intention and interpretation, I lost the last place where my heart felt understood.

And that is the burden
I carry now.
Not the ending, but the ashes of a name I never wanted to wear
The weight of being seen through a story my heart never wrote.

Perhaps this is how a garden disappears not in winter, not beneath a storm, but when the spring itself no longer recognises the hands that once taught it how to bloom.

XLII. The Love That Stayed

When I could no longer carry myself, love carried me instead My family became the arms that held the night together, gathering every tear I thought the darkness had swallowed My closest stars stayed awake beside me, never asking me to become less of myself only reminding me that broken things can still be held

So I kept walking, not because the road had become easier, but because somewhere beyond it there might still be a glimpse of you Strange, is it not, how the thought of one person can become both the wound and the reason to keep breathing?

They told me to loosen my hands, as though love were a ribbon one could simply untie, and leave beneath a tree But how does the heart release what it once mistook for forever?

How does one exile a soul that still feels like home even after the house has fallen?

There are questions sleeping beneath my tongue Why did you turn away?
How could you not see what my silence was trying to protect?
I could wake them all, let them storm the heavens, make my truth stand before you like a witness

But somewhere deeper than courage lives a frightened little heart that remembers the sound of falling and would rather bleed quietly than fall twice

So I keep loving you in the only language that asks nothing of you.

I keep the imperfectly perfect soul you became in my eyes, not as a promise, not as a prayer for return, but as a star my sky still cannot unsee

Perhaps distance will be kind to you.
Perhaps it will teach your heart the peace mine could not find.
And perhaps that is the final paradox of loving someone deeply, to wish the road carries them somewhere beautiful, even when every step away leaves your own feet standing still.
So let the seasons turn.
Let the garden grow without your knowing.
Let the spring remain.
wherever the universe has placed it.

I will carry the winter gently.
For some loves end by leaving and some remain simply because the heart never learned how to make them strangers.

"How does a heart loosen its roots, without tearing the earth it grew within?"

Mind- "Until another season blooms." Heart- "Until spring finds its way again."

*Some beginnings arrive so gently,
the heart forgets they are beginnings.
And some endings come so quietly, the heart does not know when it stopped being home.*

The Spring Behind My Glimmer
is a collection of love, longing, loss, and the seasons they leave behind.
A journey through the heart of someone who loved deeply, lost quietly, and learned that some seasons never truly leave us.

————— by —————

M E T H M A N E T H M I

